This study examined perceived and actual control of self-regulated behavior in older adult samples. Participants completed the Control Scale and perceived control was assessed for 5 types of behavior. Actual control was also assessed for 5 behaviors. Participants (N = 89) were classified as having low or high levels of perceived control and a subset of participants (N = 23) were classified as having high levels of actual control. Perceived control was related to perceived control in behaviors that were often difficult for older adults. Self-reported actual control of smoking and exercise was related to perceived control in both younger and older participants. Results indicated that perceived and actual control were related in some behaviors, but perceived and actual control were not correlated c6a93da74d
